News for Knights of Columbus

VOLUME 44 | NUMBER 16 | APRIL 24, 2026

Archbishop Fulton Sheen's television series Life Is Worth Living, which aired from 1952-57, inspired millions of viewers with his profound insights on a Christian response to modern challenges. A Fourth Degree Knight, Sheen particularly urged the laity to take a prominent role in evangelization efforts. To this day, Knights take up this call by putting their faith in action, serving their communities through initiatives such as the Knights of Columbus Saskatchewan Indoor Games, as well as through formation programs in places like Florida, where a local council is helping parishioners share and defend their faith.

Behind the Blocks

For more than 60 years, the Knights of Columbus Saskatchewan Indoor Games have celebrated world-class and amateur athletes alike with a multi-day, high-level indoor track and field meet. Since 1966, a dedicated team of 100 or more Knights has come together each year to facilitate the games and cheer on athletes of all ages and abilities.

The Argument of Holiness

Earlier this year, the Holy See announced that Venerable Fulton Sheen will be beatified in September. In his recent column for Columbia, Supreme Knight Patrick Kelly reflects on Archbishop Sheen's particular apostolate to the laity, whom he called upon in a special way to share the Gospel through lives of Christian witness. "Archbishop Sheen spent his entire life bringing people to Christ," writes the supreme knight. "He put enormous talents at the service of God — and he urged all of us, no matter our talents, to do the same."

To Defend and Share the Faith

St. Vincent de Paul Council 9618 in Fort Myers, Florida, launched a faith formation program to help fellow members and parishioners better understand Church teaching and speak about it with confidence in the public square. More than 70 people attended at the outset, and both program participation and council membership have continued to grow. “The very fact that there’s so many people interested,” said Father Murchadh Ó Madagáin, pastor, “is just an indication that people are both hungry for the truth and also want to be able to defend their faith.”
